

Determinism is the philosophical view that every event is completely determined by preceding causes together with the laws of nature. Under strict determinism, if the complete state of the universe at one moment were known, every future event would, in principle, be fixed. Philosophers debate whether determinism is compatible with free will, giving rise to positions such as compatibilism and incompatibilism.